Irene Klassen of Calgary, AB., was President of ABWM 1970-75. At Bethlehem '83, Irene was elected Canadian VP for the General Conference Women in Mission. She served for 6 years in that role, then continued on as WM representative to Commission on Education until 1992. We are pleased to present here a meditation by her.

AUTUMN

I could almost see the red colour seeping into the veins of the vines along the wall.

The golden leaves were glowing on the poplar trees. More and more red ones were appearing on the maple. Ripe apples were plopping on the ground. Autumn with its glorious burst of colour, its fruition and harvest was just beginning.

A flock of nine or ten robins suddenly appeared from nowhere, and descended on the backyard. Ravenously they devoured everything edible in front of them. They scratched under dead leaves for grubs, raced up and down branches looking for seeds and insects. They feasted on flies and spiders in the spider webs. Then an hour or so later, just as quickly as they had come, they were gone, leaving a neat and tidy yard. I wondered how far they had come this day and how far they were still going. And I marveled at the mystery of migration.

I know a place called Tanglewood, where dead and dying trees cling to living ones, their branches intertwined. In the autumn the tangled roots are covered with a thick carpet of dead leaves and more dying leaves floating down to join them. The red and gold carpet soon turns to brown, while it protects the roots of the living trees and then decays to enrich the soil and nourish new growth. What a wonderful plan for perpetual recreation.

Our lives too, are intertwined, leaning on and supporting each other, and are renewed in due season. Even as I was pondering the glories of autumn and mysteries of life and death, a group of school children passed by. New clothes, new backpacks filled with new books, new pencils and all the new things they would need for this new school year. “My new teacher is so neat! She even remembered my name!” “Mine is sort of grumpy, but he seems to know his Math and maybe I’ll get better grades.” “I’m going to keep my papers in neat order this year.” The voices faded as they passed.

I looked at the calendar. September. And there were already several dates marked. Tuesday – Women in Mission; Wednesday – Book Club; next week Monday – Choir... then Parent-Teacher meetings and several more. Summer was over and autumn was definitely here. Even as I sighed at the ending of summer, I was excited: new activities to be planned; new ideas to make committee meetings more interesting and productive; new books to read, and chances to share the summer’s reads; new music to learn. This was going to be another good year.

Endings of autumn overlap with its beginnings. The leaves will continue to colour, to fade and fall, and the birds will continue to their mysterious flight. People will continue to lean on and support each other, and God will continue to renew the earth with beauty and wonders.
